"IT IS I, BE NOT AFRAID."

Fear not, I am with thee,
Tho' the floods are round about ;
Faint not in thy weakness,
I, the Lord, shall help thee out.

Fear not, I am with thee,
Tho' the people are as grass ;
Get thee up into the mountains,
Shall my word not come to pass?

Fear not, I am with thee,
Tho' the mighty strive in vain,
Who on earth, to God is equal
My flock, from Me, shall food obtain

Fear not, I am with thee,
Tho' thy way be hard indeed ;
Have I not, in all thy weakness,
Heard thy cry, supplied thy need?

Fear not, I am with thee,
Tho 'thou doubt what I can do !
Wake and fly as does the eagle,
I thy strength shall all renew.

ONTARIO MAKES RAPID STRIDES AS POPULAR SUMMER PLAYGROUND

A ready answer to the question "Where shall we go for our holidays" is found today among the many attractive and pleasurable resorts that have made Ontario's highlands and lake districts the mecca of vacationists from all across the continent.

From the blue waters of Huron to the rock spattered streams of the Ottawa Valley, picturesque lakes, and sparkling rivers vie with each other as popular resorts.

For the ardent fisherman the Kawartha Lakes, the Thirty Thousand Islands of Georgian Bay, the Maganatawan, Pickerel and French river districts and inland lakes of Algonquin offer the best of bass, maskinonge and trout fishing.

For some a holiday is not complete without a canoe trip. For these. Timagami, the Rideau Lakes and the upper streams and lakes of Algonquin Park offer a thousand delightful canoe trips, with open-air camping and cooking thrown in for extra measure.

For general holidays such resorts as Muskoka Lakes, Lake of Bay, Georgian Bay, Kawartha Lakes, and Lakes Couchiching and Simcoe are recommended.

Any Canadian National Railways Agent will gladly givee you literature and full information on all of Ontario's summer resorts and assist you in planning your holiday

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir :—

May a strong protest be made against extra heavy charges being used in blasting in the vicinity of Napanee. On Wednesday 13th inst. the writer had a hen setting, the chickens just peeping through the shell, and about 7.30 p.m. an extra heavy blast was let off. The shock was so great that for a few seconds one wondered if the walls of the house would stand. However, on recovering and thinking of the setting hen, also remembering the old saying that a heavy shock, such as thunder would kill chickens in the shell, I immediately examined the eggs and partly hatched chickens and found very chicken dead. Remember, these were alive an hour or so before. No farmers or poultry men can afford such losses, especially when it is unnecessary and only owing to carelessness or ignorance. Therefore steps should be taken by the proper authorities to prevent repitition.

A. S HUGHSON,
Secretary Napanee Poultry Association.

TALKLESS BARBER.

One May Put His Head Into Machine and Get a Haircut?

By the simple process of dropping a nickel in the slot the residents of a big city may now buy stamps, subway rides, soup and ice cream sodas.

The time is not far distant, according to Anatol Josepho, when one may put his head and a half-dollar into a machine and get a haircut.

Mr. Josepho is the inventor of a machine, which he recently sold for $1,000,000, in which the customer may photograph himself. He sits in a chair, drops a 25-cent piece in the slot and presently extracts a strip of eight pictures of himself.

The country is tending, Mr. Josepho said, toward the development not only of machines which will sell almost every conceivable product automatically, but toward the invention of devices which will perform some type of service.

One of the largest chain store organizations in the United States is experimenting with the use of automatic machines for replacing part of the work which is done by clerks.

COUNTY COURT

And general sessions of the Peace opened in the Court House last Tuesday, when the following cases were tried :

The King vs. Leonard Bradford—An action brought by the Crown against Leonard Bradford, engineer, of the freight train which figured in the fatal accident at Dockrill siding on the C. P. Railway. The jury brought in a verdict of not guilty. Mr. Roebuck, Toronto, appeared for defendant and U. M. Wilson, K.C., C.C.A., for the Crown.

Vannest vs. Perry—An action for damages brought by W. H. Vannest and Ada Vannest for damages caused by Perry's pony backing into the auto occupied by Plaintiffs, who were driving quietly on Main street, Napanee, and seriously injuring plaintiff, Ada Vannest, who claimed that the pony and cart were left on the street unattended and untethered. The jury found in favor of plaintiff's and awarded W. H. Vannest $135.00 and Ada Vannest $100.00. After the plaintiff's evidence was all in Mr. Herrington, on behalf of the defendant, moved for non-suit and for this reason His Honor has reserved judgment. Mr. Cunningham, K.C., for plaintiffs and W. N. Herrington, K.C. for defendant.

Davy vs. Bituminous Spraying Co.—On Dec. 7th, after 5 o'clock p.m., plaintiff's son was driving a motor car in a westerly direction on the highway, about two miles west of Napanee. A heavy motor truck with trailer attached also going west, stopped ahead of plaintiff's car on the right hand side of highway, said motor and trailer being without any lights whatever. Plaintiff's car ran into the trailer with considerable damage resulting. The Jury found in favor of plaintiff, awarding him $243.00 damages. W. S. Herrington, K. C., for plaintiff. U. M Wilson, K.C., for defendants.

ALTAR HID BURIED TREASURE.

Jewels and Rare Objects of Art Concealed by Mayas 700 Years Ago.

Turquoises and other rare and beautiful objects which were buried beneath an altar in Chichen Itza some 700 years ago have been discovered by Earl Morris, archeologist of the Carnegie Institution of Washington says a Science Service Bulletin.

A telegraphic report from Mr. Morris states that the space beneath the altar has not been fully explored, but articles which have been removed from their hiding place under the altar prove it to be the most important cache of Maya objects known in Yucatan. A magnificent mosaic disk containing one thousand beautiful cut and polished turquoises is pronounced the most elaborate and beautiful product of the Maya civilization that has ever been discovered.

The altar find was made in the temple of the Warriors, which is one of the masterpieces of Maya architecture. Each column in the temple is graven with the figure of a warrior in full regalia, and it is believed that the eighty or more warriors are all portraits of real Maya heroes. The temple, however, was built in honor of the Plumed Serpent, an important Maya deity.

26,618 KILLED ON STREETS.

Nearly 800,000 Were Seriously Hurt In U. S. In 1927.

Persons killed in highway accidents in the United States in 1927 were estimated at 26,618 by the American Road Builders' Association. A total of 198,700 were seriously injured and economic losses were placed at $672,087,000, exclusive of minor damage to motor vehicles.

The total killed, an increase of 1,216 over 1926, and the injuries and attendant losses, the association said, brings forcibly to mind that need for immediate adoption of uniform traffic codes and expansion of the nation's road building programs.

Grade crossing fatalities were said to have shown a decline for the first 11 months of 1927, the number of persons killed totalling 2,126, as compared with 2,244 for the same period the year before.

SEEN FROM THE SIDELINES

Last Wednesday the Napanee Leafs took part in the Sports Day Celebration at Centreville, where they played the fast Tamworth nine, winning by the score of 7-6. The game, as the score indicates, was closely contested throughout. "Dod" Johnston, in pitching her first game of the year for Napanee, turned in a good effort. The Napanee team was hastily assembled, many of the regulars being unable to leave work or school to accompany the team. Louise McGuire, a sister of the heavy hitting outfielder of last season, was pressed into service as shortstop, and immediately caught the fancy of the crowd. If Manager Killorin can sign up a few players from Strathcona and Deseronto, he will have a championship team again, but it looks as though there is not the talent available in the town itself to make a team like the 1927 Leafs

* * *

With all the new greens, except the second, in working order, there has been a great revival of golfing enthusiasm lately. There is only one fault with the new layout of the course. There is now no cross-crossing. The only time that we now encounter another group of players is when we ourselves catch overtake us. We no longer have an opportunity of meeting another foursome on the course, and shouting to them that we might have made the last hole in three had we not dubbed our drive and missed two putts.

The main trouble with golf is that it cannot be watched from the peanut gallery. It is not a game which attracts, except in exceptional circumstances, large crowds of spectators. Those who play golfers are apt to consider it rather an inferior pastime from the standpoint of prowess required, of difficulty of playing, and of interest. They may get an occasional glimpse of a man dressed in knickerbockers, swinging at a white ball knocking it long distances with apparent ease, and walking quietly after it to the accompaniment of no swearing or throwing of pop bottles. So that they decide that it is alright for old men, but "they can't see anything to it."

The golfer's gold as a harmless pastime for elderly semi-cripples however, they fail to hurt the game, or worry the players who know that there is a very great deal to it. For golf, make no mistake, is a real game. It has in it qualities that will plumb the skill and physical force of the greatest athete

There are, of course, dilettantes who play the game because they think they look well in knickers. There are ladies who join the club so they enjoy tea on the clubhouse porch. But when you come to par golf, you will find no inmates of sanitiria on the course.

The trouble with the average unbeliever and his attitude towards golf is that he has not had an opportunity of seeing good men play. He may have seen a half a dozen messenger boys kick a football around a vacant lot, but it is not on this he bases his opinion of soccer ; he does not guage the game of baseball play-ed by school boys by the game of Ty Cobb or Babe Ruth.

The two hundred and seventy-five yard drive in golf is equivalent to the home run in baseball, and the man who makes it consistently is a Ruth or a Waner. And the champion golfer would be a champion in any line of sport to which he turned his energy. If their game looks easy it is because they are experts at their game. They have skill and strength. The ball that travels so far when hit by their clubs, has not been the result of no love pat They are properly punished in the right place before they fly so swiftly and unerringly.

The scoffer, when advised that it isn't so easy, and is invited to try a drive, steps confidently up to the ball, and time times out of ten misses it. It is not until he has decided to master this simple game, and has spent several years at it, that he begins to realize one must have the suppleness of a contortionist to get his ball, past the two hundred mark. Then, when he has commenced to learn something about driving, the would be par player must add to his accomplishments the ability to play out of all sorts of "lies," to judge distances and the clubs necessary to attain them, to approach small greens from varying angles, and to putt the hall down.

Oh, golf is a real game.

Country trade is now City trade

Realize the immense change in conditions—in just a few years — that the telephone has helped bring about.

The store in the smaller town now carries pretty much the same up-to-date styles as the big city store. Thanks to Long Distance, Manufacturers' or Wholesalers' warehouses are practically at the storekeeper's elbow. The time required to telephone an order by Long Distance is now only a few minutes; connections are now often made at once, without hanging up the receiver.

And the cost of Long Distance messages is small — is often quite a little less than is generally supposed.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

BY REV. C. G. TRUMBULL. (Editor of The Sunday School Times).

REVIEW: JESUS THE SAVIOUR.

Sunday, June 24th.

Golden Text—Choose you this day whom ye will serve. (Josh. 24:15.)

It is often said that the purpose of Christ in becoming man and living a human lifetime here on earth was in order to reveal God to men. This is a misleading statement, and it is significant that it is made largely by those who minimize or deny the substitutionary death and blood atonement of Christ. To reveal God was not the chief purpose of Christ's incarnation. It is true that, in His person as the Son of man He revealed God. Because He was both man and God it could not be otherwise. It is true that Jesus Christ "is the image of the invisible God" that "it pleased the Father that in Him should all fullness dwell," and that "in Him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily" (Col. 1:15, 19; 2:9). It is true that Christ said, "He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father" (John 14:9). Yes, surely Christ revealed God. But is there any Scripture that says this was His purpose in being "made in the likeness of men?" There is no such Scripture.

What, then, was His purpose? On this the Scriptures are inescapably clear, with a great crescendo note of testimony and revelation from Genesis to the Apocalypse. Christ became man in order that He might die. He "was made in the likeness of men" in order that He might humble Himself, and become "obedient unto death, even the death of the cross" (Phil. 2:7, 8).

God had revealed Himself in many ways to men, from the time of the Garden of Eden onward. Practically all the miracles wrought by Christ during His earthly ministry had been wrought before He came, by one or another of the prophets of God. God did not need a human incarnation in order to reveal Himself to men. But there was one thing and one thing only, He could not do without becoming man—and that was to die. Unless the Son of God, after becoming man, had died in place of the sinner, all sinners—which means the entire human race—would have died eternally. The revelation of God in Christ could save no one. It is the death of Christ that brought salvation and life to men.

Let us keep this central fact in mind as we review the lessons in the earthly ministry of the Lord.

1. Jesus the Suffering Messiah. Mark 8:27 to 9:1; 9:30-32; 10:30-34. The moment the disciples had recognized Jesus as the Christ, the Son of the living God, He began to teach them why He had come to earth—to "be killed, and after three days rise again." Peter in unconscious sin tried to dissuade the Lord from this, and He exposed Satan as speaking through Peter. Satan did not want Christ to become man's Sin-bearer.

2. The Ressurection. (Easter lesson). Mark 16:1-20. Although He submitted to death, death could not hold Christ. His body was raised from the dead, and the bodies of all believers in Him will be raised, for He is an "uttermost" Saviour, able to save spirit, soul and body.

3 Transfiguration and Service. Mark 9:2-29. Christ's transfiguration was a prophecy and foreglean of His coming again in glory and power (Mark 9:1). On the mount with Elijah and Moses His death was the theme of their conversation (Luke 9:31).

4. Jesus and the Home. Mark 10:1-16. Marriage is the most sacred relationship ordained by God for human beings. For this reason divorce is allowable only when the marriage relationship has been actually dissolved by the sin of adultery.

5. The Cost of Discipleship. Mark 10:17-27; 12:41-44. As the cross was the only way by which Christ could become the life of those dead in trespasses and sins, so His cross, or crucifixion with Him, is our only way of life with Him. "Take up the cross, and follow Me," is Jesus' only way of discipleship. Those who will not die to sin and self cannot follow Christ.

6. Greatness Through Service. Mark 9:33-50; 10:35-45. Death is the keynote again. Because even the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give His life a ransom for many," the life of service in His footsteps is the only way of greatness.

7 Jesus Enters Jerusalem. Mark 11:1-33. The same Jesus who entered Jerusalem and was hailed as representing "The Kingdom of our father David' is coming again, to enter Jerusalem and to set up the throne of David there and reign over His people Israel. That will be the real triumphal entry! It is predicted in Psalm 24:6 and Psalm 24:7-10.

8. Jesus Teaching in the Temple. Mark 12:1344. Men try to trap their Creator. It cannot be done. They only trap themselves when they try it. Men's wisdom does not quite equal God's omnisience. The Lord gave infallible truth on patriotism, on worship, on resurrection, on the two greatest commandments, and on the spirit of right giving.

9. The Wicked Husbandmen. (May be used with temperance application). Mark 12:1-2; 13:1-37. God is the long-suffering person in the universe. But His patience can be exhausted, as Christ's parable shows. It is a terrible thing to put ourselves beyond God's grace. And Christ is coming again.

10. Jesus Facing Betrayal and Death. Mark 14:1-42. Two great mysteries: how Judas could betray Christ; and how Christ could be identified with our sin. The Lord's Supper, and the agony in Gethsemane, are set forth in a single verse in 2 Corinthians 5:21.

11. The Arrest and Trial. Mark 14:43 to 15:15. Christ could not be apprehended until He voluntarily gave Himself up. Men and Satan thought they were carrying through their purposes against Him, and they were; but God was carrying through His purposes also.

12 The Crucifixion. Mark 15:16-17. The Old Testament picture of this black scene is Psalm 22. As the Son was separated from the Father because made sin for us, the light in the heavens went out and the world was convulsed by earthquake. It was the consummation of the surrender of God—and it brought glory to men

The Duchess of Bedford, latest addition to the Canadian Pacific's fleet of passenger liners on the Atlantic, is the first of four cabin class vessels being constructed for the Canadian Pacific to be added to the company's service on the St. Lawrence route, and they will also be used for winter cruise purposes.

Winnipeg. — According to statistics recently collected from 248,162 farms, there are 6.8 horses to each farm in Manitoba and a tractor to every 4.6 farms in the province. Each Saskatchewan farm has 10.2 horses and there is one tractor to every 4.7 farms, in Alberta there are 10.8 horses to each farm and one tractor to every 7.5 farms.

Ottawa, Ontario. — Employment stood at a higher level in Canada in April, 1928, than in any April as far back as records go. Returns from 6,191 employers of labor with working forces aggregating 842,940 persons, showed the employment index standing at 101.1, as compared with 96.2 in April, 1927, and 84.1 in April, 1926.

Winnipeg.—Homestead entries in the four Western Provinces for the first quarter of the year totalled 1,816, as compared with 1,030 in the first quarter of 1927. Those in Manitoba were 107, as compared with 128; in Saskatchewan 655 as against 513; in Alberta 982, as compared with 367; and in British Columbia 72, against 12.

Earnings and expenses statement of the Canadian Pacific Railway for the month of April, issued from headquarters of the company, show net profits up $150,944.85 as compared with April of last year. Net profits for the four months to end of April are increased by $1,802,617.71 as compared with the same period of 1927.

The English Rugby League Football team, at the present time touring Australia and New Zealand, is scheduled to arrive at Vancouver on R. M. S. Niagara, September 14, and will play a game there next day, leaving on the Trans-Canada afterwards for Montreal where another game will be played September 20, before sailing for England on the Duchess of Atholl next day.

Free scholarships to C. P. R. apprentices or employees under 21 or to minor sons of employes of the company covering five years' tuition in Chemical or Civil Engineering at the Ecole Polytechnique of the University of Montreal and four years' tuition at the Montreal School for higher commercial studies are announced by circular over the signature of Grant Hall, senior vice-president of the railway. The scholarships are two in number, one at each of the institutions of learning specified, and are decided by highest standing in competitive examination.

SUMMER PASTURE FOR BROOD SOWS

(Experimental Farms Note)

In order to obtain the best results in the feeding of market hogs, it is absolutely essential to give due consideration to the brood sows which produce the young pigs. It is generally considered that the health and condition of the sow at breeding time and during the subsequent period of pregnancy has a marked bearing on the size of the litter as well as on the size and vitality of the pigs.

The sow should not be fat either at breeding time nor during the gestation period, but she should be in a good healthy condition with a tendency toward more flesh as farrowing time approaches. This condition is best obtained by encouraging plenty of exercise and supplying a ration which is largely made up of roughages and succulent feeds. During the summer season a well watered pasture provided with ample shade and protection from cold rains, is an ideal location for brood sows. There may be some doubt as to the advisability of using pasture for growing pigs, but there is no doubt as to its value for brood sows.

At the Dominion Experimental Station, Kapuskasing, Ontario, it has been found that brood sows do particularly well under conditions as described above. In this way it is possible to carry the sows over the summer period at a minimum cost and in a very vigorous and thriving condition. The pasture was supplemented by a light ration made up of coarse health producing grains, such as bran, shorts and oats, with barley used occasionally if some gains were desired.

A good growth of red clover or alfalfa would be excellent as a pasture, but if these are not available an ordinary grass pasture will be much better than none

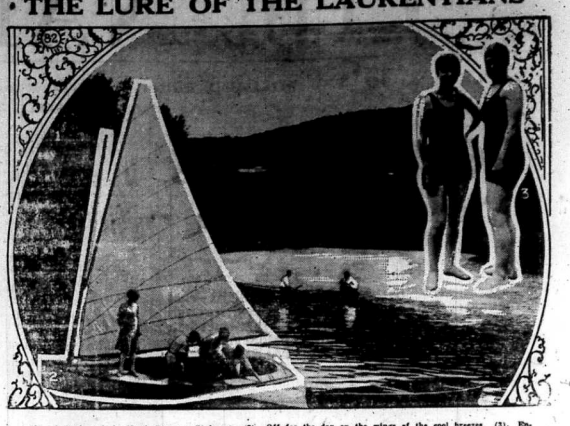
The recent installation of a Swedish model farm on a very large estate in England accords one more example of the demand for Swedish farming methods in various parts of Europe.

On a recent journiey to Moscow with Swedish horses, ordered by the Soviet Government for use on farms, Director Leufven arranged with the Soviet authorities for the establishment in Russia of a completely-equipped model Swedish farm, in connection with which project several Russian agricultural experts have been visiting Sweden.

It is estimated that in the last fifty years the milk product of cows in Sweden has been doubled, while even in the last fifteen years the quantity of milk per cow has risen from 1,500 to 2,000 kilograms with an increase of fat of over five per cent.

GET IT AT WALLACE'S

THE LURE OF THE LAURENTIANS



(1). A section of the North River at Piedmont. (2). Off for the day on the wings of the cool breezes. (3). Enjoying the best sport of all.

The Spring Floods in the Laurentians have in no way affected the fishing in that district, sportsmen returning to Montreal have stated, adding that the fish are biting better than previous years and that the catch has exceeded their past records.

The Laurentians, so popular during the winter for skiers, enjoy in reality a year round favour in the eyes of holiday hunters, and have at every season some particular attraction to offer. At present the fishing is bringing many sportsmen up into the mountains, and as usual this is proving to be the best.

The Mont Tremblant district is perhaps the most attractive and interesting in the Laurentians. This mountain was known to the Indians as "Manitou Ewitchi-Gama" or "Mountain of the Great Manitou," and the legendary dominating power of the range beneath whose wrath the whole district trembled.

There are beautiful lakes npt far from Mont Tremblant, Lake Gauthier and Lake Ouimet, where a hotel and summer cottages have been built and good fishing abounds. The district north of Mont Tremblant is a pathless wilderness stretching as far north as the Arctic Circle, with no settlements whatever. The only human habitations are those of lumbermen and hunters, who canoe up the Deville River and the intervening lakes during the fall of the year, making their permanent camp about one hundred miles north of Mont Tremblant.

Access to this recreation land is provided by the Canadian Pacific Railway from Montreal to such places as Shawbridge, Piedmont, Ste. Marguerite, Val Morin, Ste. Agathe, Ivry, St. Faustin, Labelle and Mont Laurier, and the end of the line. The line running north from Ottawa to Maniwaki is no less liked and carries many anglers northwards from the capital for a spring vacation with rod and line at this time.

On the Athabasca Trail

The visitor to Jasper National Park in the Canadian Rockies finds that nature has made a lavish distribution of her beauty spots within this, the largest National Park and game sanctuary in America. Towering mountain peaks, pleasant valleys and shimmering lakes all help to make this a land of real enchantment.

The Athabasca River, from its birthplace among the glaciers and icefields of this region, flows down first through Rocky Gorges and then through a wide, pleasant valley. At one point it tumbles over a cliff at the foot of Mount Kerkeslin, and here at Athabasca Falls is one of the beauty spots of the famed Athabasca Trail.

At the conclusion of their 1928 convention which is to be held at the Macdonald Hotel, Edmonton this year, the members of the Canadian Weekly Newspapers' Association will visit Jasper National Park, and will spend a short holiday amid the beauties of this largest and finest of Canada's national play-grounds. — Canadian National Railways photograph

SAFEGUARDING THE FARM WATER SUPPLY

(Experimental Farms Note)

That many farm wells are not amply protected from pollution and are potential sources of danger from water-borne diseases as typhoid, dysentery, etc., is the conclusion drawn from the results of the analysis at the Central Experimental Farm of water samples from rural wells. Of 450 samples of water submitted during the past four years, bacteriological tests indicated that 37 per cent. were quite free from pollution. Thirty-one per cent. of the samples were definitely polluted, while a like number were of a suspicious character pointing to possible contamination.

In the majority of cases contaminated water comes from the ordinary shallow well with its much greater possibility for admitting germs of several origin than the drilled well which taps lower, purer depths. The location is very frequently at fault, and an examination of the data furnished with the samples shows a very distinct relationship between the quality of the water and the distance from such sources of pollution as privy, cess-spool, barnyard, etc.

Fifty yards may be considered the minimum safe distance from any source of pollution, indeed experiments have shown that it is possible for bacteria from polluted sources to enter the water of a well 200 feet or more away when the well is in the direction of the ground water flow.

If the well is situated at a safe distance, it is next in importance to have it so constructed that any ground water must pass through soil and thus be filtered before entering the well. This can only be effected by insuring that the sides of the well, for a depth of 12-15 feet, are tight and impervious to water. The top, naturally, should be so constructed that no contamination can enter.

In emergency, water from contaminated or suspicious wells can be rendered safe by boiling and also by chlorinating with chloride of lime, but at best this is only a temporary makeshift and does not get at the root of the trouble. The remedy is to construct a new well bear three points in mind: (1) that a deep well is best, (2) that a safe distance from contamination is essential and (3) that the construction is right.

JEWS IN NEW YORK.

Are Moving Away From Less Desirable Residential Districts.

Improved economic conditions among the Jews of New York are shown by their increasing movement away from the less desirable residential districts, according to the Jewish Communal Survey of Greater New York.

Thirty per cent. of the population of New York is Jewish, the survey shows. In 1925 there were 1,750,000 Jews residing in the five boroughs. This, it was shown, represents an increase of 16.4 per cent. since 1916, which declared to be in exact proportion to the general growth of population in New York.

The widening of the area in which the residences of the Jewish population are located, was said in the report to be one of the outstanding tendencies indicated by the research. New York's lower East Side tenements housed only 15.2 per cent. of the Jewish population of the city in 1925, as compared with 23.5 per cent. in 1916, according to the statistics.

The drift of Jewish population "from the tenement districts to Yorkville, Harlem, the Bronx, and, finally, into the Park Avenue section," is regarded in the survey. It shows that Brooklyn has supplanted Manhattan as "the centre of Jewish population and for some time to come will be the new focus of attention" as far as the Jewish communal program is concerned.

A POPULAR MAGISTRATE.

"Judge" Cohen First Saw the Light of Day in England.

There is no more notable figure at the City Hall, Toronto than Jacob Cohen, and no one man has done more to earn the rewards of the Peacemaker. His unfailing and dispensation of justice especially among his own people, may be noted every day since he began to haunt the police court, first as an interpreter, then as justice of the peace finally as full-fledged police magistrate. The name "Judge" Cohen is seen to hang by his own people is now given to him by all his friends, who are legion.

Recently he told a reporter he was "a ship canoodled to Quebec."

"From needles to anchors. Cases trifling you wonder why they ever go to court, cases involving issues worthy of the darkest color"—such was his picturesque summing-up of the daily police court proceedings over which he presides.

His life-story might have been copied from Arabian Nights. Emigrant to New York at 14, peddler through the farming districts of Northern England, on the steamboats of the Mississippi, at the age of 21 coming to Toronto, renting a little store on Queen street, at 34 a month. Successful shoe merchant, real estate dealer, official in a dozen synagogues and Jewish societies, he left business to assist in straightening out the legal tangles of his fellow Hebrews. As J. P., he began an intensive study of justice under the great mastership of old Col. Denison, with whom he enjoyed the warmest of friendships.

Magistrate Cohen is sixty-eight years of age.

CHAPTER I.

The good people of Devonshire were rather given to quarreling—sometimes about the minister's wife, meek, gentle Mrs. Tiverton, whose manner of housekeeping, or style of dress, did not exactly suit them; sometimes about the minister himself, good, patient Mr. Tiverton, who vainly imagined that if he preached three sermons a week, attended the Wednesday evening prayer-meeting, the Thursday evening sewing society, officiated at every funeral, visited all the sick, and gave to every beggar who darked at his door, besides superintending the Sunday school, he was earning his salary of six hundred per year.

Sometimes, and that not rarely, the quarrel crept into the choir, and then, for one whole Sunday, it was all in vain that Mr. Tiverton read the psalm and hymn, casting troubled glances toward the vacant seats of his refractory singers. There was no one to respond, unless it were good old Mr. Hodges, who pitched so high that few could follow him; while Mrs. Captain Simpson—whose daughter, the organist, had been snubbed at the last choir meeting by Mr. Hodges' daughter, the alto singer—rolled up her eyes at her next neighbor, or fanned herself luriously in token of her disgust.

Latterly, however, there had come up a new cause of quarrel, before which every other cause sank into insignificance. Now, though the village of Devonshire could boast but one public schoolhouse, said house being divided into two departments, the upper and lower divisions, there were in the town several district schools; and for the last few years a committee of three had been annually appointed to examine and decide upon the merits of the various candidates for teaching, giving to each, if the decision were favorable, a little slip of paper certifying their qualifications to teach a common school. Strange that over such an office so fierce a feud should have arisen; but when Mr. Tiverton, Squire Lamb, and Lawyer Whittemore, in the full conviction that they were doing right, refused a certificate of scholarship to Laura Tisdale, niece of Mrs. Judge Tisdale, and awarded it to one whose earnings in a factory had procured for her a thorough English education, the villagers, to use a vulgar phrase, were at once set by the ears, the aristocracy abusing, and the democracy upholding the dismayed trio, who, as the breeze blew harder, quietly resigned their office, and Devonshire was without a school committee.

In this emergency something must be done, and, as the two belligerent parties could only unite on a stranger, it seemed a matter of special providence that only two months before, young Dr. Holbrook, a native of the modern Athens, had rented the pleasant little office on the village common, formerly occupied by old Dr. Carey, now lying in the graveyard by the side of some whose days he had prolonged, and others whose days he had surely shortened. Besides being handsome, and skilful, and quite as familiar with the poor as the rich, the young doctor was descended from the aristocratic line of Boston Holbrooks, facts which tended to make him a favorite with both classes; and, greatly to his surprise, he found himself unanimously elected to the responsible office of sole Inspector of Common Schools in Devonshire. It was in vain that he remonstrated, saying he knew nothing whatever of the qualifications requisite for a teacher; that he could not talk to girls, young ones especially; that he should make a miserable failure, and so forth. The people would not listen. Somebody must examine the teachers, and that somebody might as well be Dr. Holbrook as anybody.

"Only strict with 'em, draw the reins tight, find out to your satisfaction whether a gal knows her P's and Q's before you give her a certificate. We've had enough of your 'ologies and muses," said Colonel Lewis, the democratic potentate to whom Dr. Holbrook was expressing his fears that he should not give satisfaction. Then, as a bright idea suggested itself to the old gentleman, he added: "I tell you what, just cut one or two at first; that'll give you a name for being particular, which is just the thing."

Accordingly, with no definite ides as to what was expected of him, except that he was to find out "whether a gal knew her P's and Q's," and was also to "cut one or two of the first candidates," Dr. Holbrook accepted the office, and then awaited rather nervously his initiation. He was not easy in the society of ladies unless, indeed, the lady stood in need of his professional services, when he lost sight of her at once, and thought only of her disease. His patient once well, however, he became exceedingly shy and embarrassed, retreating as soon as possible from her presence to the covert of his friendly office, where, with his boots upon the table and his head thrown back in a most comfortable position, he sat one April morning, in happy oblivion of the busy world, when, must, of course, ere long invade his sanctum.

"Something for you, sir," the lady will wait for an answer," said his "chore boy," passing to his master a little three-cornered note, and nodding toward the street.

Following the direction indicated, the doctor saw, drawn up near his door, an old-fashioned one-horse wagon, such as is still occasionally seen in New England. A square-boxed, dark green wagon, drawn by a sorrel horse, sometimes called by the genuine Yankee "yellow," and driven by a white-haired man, whose silvery locks, falling around his wrinkled face, gave to him a pleasing, patriarchal appearance, which interested the doctor far more than did the flutter of the blue ribbon beside him, even though the bonnet that ribbon tied shaded the face of a young girl. The note was from her, and, tearing it open, the doctor read, in the prettiest of all pretty, girlish handwriting:

"Dr. Holbrook—

Here it was plainly visible that a "D" had been written as if she would have said "Dear." Then, evidently changing her mind, she had with her finger blotted out the "D," and made it into an oddly shaped "S," so that it read simply:

"Dr. Holbrook—Sir Will you be at leisure to examine me on Monday afternoon, at three o'clock?

"Madeline A. Clyde

"P.S.—For particular reasons I hope you can attend to me as early as Monday. M.A.C."

Dr. Holbrook knew very little of girls, but he thought this note, with its P.S., decidedly girlish. Still he made no comment either verbal or mental, so flurried was he with knowing that the evil he so much dreaded had come upon him at last. Had it been left to his choice, he would far rather have extracted every one of that maiden's teeth, than to have set himself up before her like some horrid ogre, asking what she knew. But the choice was not his, and, turning to the boy, he said, laconically, "Tell her to come."

Most men would have sought for a glimpse of the face under the bonnet tied with blue, but Dr. Holbrook did not care a pennyone whether it were ugly or fair, though it did strike him that the voice was singularly sweet, which, after the boy had delivered his message, said to the old man, "Now, grandpa, we'll go home. I know you must be tired."

Slowly Sorrel trotted down the street, the blue ribbons fluttering in the wind, while one little ungloved hand was seen carefully adjusting about the old man's shoulders the ancient camlet cloak which had done duty for many a year, and was need ed on this chill April day. The doctor saw all this, and the impression left upon his mind was that Candidate No. 1 was probably a meek kind of a girl, and very good to her grandfather. But what should he ask her, and how demean himself toward her? Monday afternoon was frightfully near, he thought, as this was only Saturday; and then, feeling that he must be ready, he brought out from the trunk, where, since his arrival in Devonshire, they had been quietly lying, books enough to have frightened an older person than poor little Madeline Clyde, riding slowly home with grandpa, and wishing so much that she'd had a glimpse of Dr. Holbrook, so as to know what he was like, and hoping he would give her a clue as to what some of the many pages of geography and "Parley's History," which she knew by heart. How she would have trembled, could she have seen the formidable volumes heaped upon his table and waiting for her. There were French and Latin grammars, "Hamilton's Metaphysics," "Olmstead's Philosophy," "Day's Algebra," "Butler's Analogy," and many others, into which poor Madeline had never so much as looked. Arranging them in a row, and half wishing himself back again to the days when he had studied them, the doctor went out to visit his patients, of which there were so many that Madeline Clyde entirely escaped his mind, nor did she trouble him again until the dreaded Monday came, and the hands of his watch pointed to two.

"One hour more," he said to himself, just as the roll of wheels and a cloud of dust announced the approach of something.

Could it be Sorrel and the square-boxed wagon? Oh, no; far different from Grandfather Clyde's turnout were the stylish carriage and the spirited bays dashing down the street, the colored driver reining them suddenly, not before the office door, but just in front of the white cottage in the same yard, the house where Dr. Holbrook boarded, and where, if he ever married in Devonshire, he would most likely bring his wife.

"Guy Remington, the very chap of all others whom I'd rather see, and, as I live, there's Agnes, with Jessie. Who knew she was in these parts?" was the doctor's mental exclamation, as, running his fingers through his hair and making a feint of pulling up the corners of his rather limp collar, he hurried out to the carriage, from which a dashing-looking lady of thirty, or thereabouts, was alighting.

"Why, Agnes, I beg your pardon, Mrs. Remington, when did you come?" he asked, offering his hand to the lady, who, coquettishly shaking back from her pretty, dollish face a profusion of light brown curls, gave him the tips of her white kid, while she told him she had come to Aikenside the Saturday before; and hearing from Guy that the lady with whom he boarded was an old friend of hers, she had driven over to call, and brought Jessie with her. "Here, Jessie, speak to the doctor. He was your dear papa's friend," and a very proper sigh escaped Agnes Remington's lips as she patted a little curly-haired girl toward Dr. Holbrook.

The lady of the house had spied them by this time, and came running down the walk to meet her rather distinguished visitor, wondering, it may be, to what she was indebted for this call from one who, since her marriage with the supposedly wealthy Dr. Remington, had rather cut her former acquaintance. Agnes was delighted to see her, and as Guy declined entering the cottage just then, the two friends disappeared within the door, with the doctor and Guy remaining in the office, the latter sitting down in the very chair intended for Madeline Clyde. This reminded the doctor of his courtesy, and also brought the comforting thought that Guy, who had never failed him yet, would assist him in some negative way. But he would not speak of her just now; he had other matters to talk about, and, pushing his pen-knife into a nine-thile covered with similar gems, he said: "Agnes, is seems, has come to Aikenside, notwithstanding the dissuasive she ever would," when she found that the whole of the Remington property belonged to your mother, and not your father."

"Oh, yes; She got over her pique as soon as I settled a handsome little income on Jessie. And, in fact, on her too, until she is foolish enough to marry again, when it will cease. Of course, I do not feel it my duty to support any man's wife, unless it be my own, or my father's," was Guy Remington's reply; whereupon the penknife went again into the table, and this time with so much force that the point was broken off; but the doctor did not mind it, and with the jagged end continued to make jagged marks, while he continued: "Shall hardly marry again, though she may. She's young—not over twenty-six—"

"Twenty-eight, if the family Bible does not lie," but she'd never forgive me if she knew I told you that. So let it pass that she's twenty-six. She certainly is not more than three years your senior, a mere nothing, if you wish to make her. Mrs. Holbrook," and Guy's dark eyes scanned curiously the doctor's face, as if seeking there for the secret of his proud young bachelor's anxiety to visit plain Mrs. Conner that afternoon. But the doctor only laughed merrily at the idea of his being father to Guy, his college chum and long-tried friend.

Agnes Remington was reclining languidly in Mrs. Conner's easy-chair, and overwhelming her former friend with descriptions of the gay parties she had attended in Boston, and the fine sights she saw in Europe, while her grey-haired husband had taken her for a wedding tour—would not have felt particularly flattered could she have seen that smile, or heard how easily, from talking of her, Dr. Holbrook turned to another theme, to Madeline Clyde, expected now almost every moment. There was a merry laugh on Guy's part, as he listened to the doctor's story, and, when it was finished, he said: "Why, I see nothing so very distasteful in examining a pretty girl, and puzzling her, to see her blush, I half wish I were in your place. I should enjoy the novelty of the thing."

"Oh, take it then; take my place, Guy," the doctor exclaimed, eagerly. "She does not know me from Adam. Here are books, all you will need. You went to a district school once a week when you were staying in the country. You surely have some idea, while I have not the slightest. Will you, Guy?" he persisted more earnestly, as he heard wheels in the street, and was sure old Sorrel had come again.

Guy Remington liked anything savoring of a frolic, but in his mind there were certain, conscientious scruples touching the justice of the thing, and so at first he demurred, while the doctor still insisted, until at last he laughingly consented to commence the examination, provided the doctor would sit by and occasionally come to his aid.

"You must write the certificate, of course," he said, "testifying that she is qualified to teach."

"Yes, certainly, Guy, if she is; but maybe she won't be, and my orders are to be strict."

"How did she look?" Guy asked, and the doctor replied: "Saw nothing but her bonnet. Came in a queer old go-piggle of a wagon, such as your country farmers drive. Guess she won't be likely to stir up the bile of either of us, particularly as I am bullet-proof, and you have been so for years. By the way, when do you cross the sea again for the fair Lucy? Sumner says this summer."

"Rumor is wrong, as usual, then," was Guy's reply, a soft light stealing into his handsome eyes. Then, after a moment, he added: "Miss Atherstone's health is far too delicate for her to incur the risks of a climate like ours. If she were well acclimated, I should be glad, for it is terribly lonely up at Aikenside."

"And do you really think a wife would make it pleasanter?" Dr. Holbrook asked, the tone of his voice indicating a little doubt as to a man's being happier for having a helpmate to share his joys and sorrows.

But no such doubts dwelt in the mind of Guy Remington. Eminently fitted for domestic happiness, he looked forward anxiously to the time when sweet Lucy Atherstone, the fair English girl to whom he had become engaged when, four years before, he visited Europe, should be strong enough to bear transplanting to American soil. Twice since his engagement he had visited her, finding her always lovely, gentle, and yielding. Too yielding, it sometimes seemed to him, while occasionally the thought had flashed upon him that she did not possess a very strong degree of intellect. But he said to himself, he did not care; he hated strong-minded women, and would far rather his wife should be a little weak than masculine, like his Aunt Margaret, who sometimes wore bloomers, and advocated women's rights. Yes, he greatly preferred Lucy Atherstone, as she was, to a wife like the stately Margaret, or like Agnes, his pretty mother, who only thought how she could best attract attention; and as it had never occurred to him that there might be a happy medium, that a woman need not be brainless to be feminine and gentle, he was satisfied with his choice, as well he might be, for a fairer, sweeter flower never bloomed than Lucy Atherstone, his affianced bride. Guy loved to think of Lucy, and as the doctor's remarks brought her to his mind, he went off into a reverie concerning her, becoming so lost in thought that until the doctor's hand was laid upon his shoulder by way of rousing him, he did not see that what his friend had designated as a go-piggle was entering in front of the office, and that from it a young girl was alighting.

Naturally very polite to females, Guy's first impulse was to go to her assistance, but she did not need it, as was proven by the light spring with which she reached the ground. The white-haired man was with her again, but he evidently did not intend to stop and a close observer might have detected a shade of sadness and anxiety upon his face as Madeline called cheerily on to him: "Good by, grandpa. Don't fear for me; I hope you will have good luck." Then, as he drove away, she ran a step after him and said: "Don't look so sober, for if Mr. Remington won't let 'you have the money, there's my pony, Beauty. I am willing to give him up."

"Never, Maddy. It's all the little fortin', you've got. I'll let the old place go first"; and, chirruping to Sorrel, the old man drove on, while Madeline walked, with a beating heart, to the office door, knocking timidly.

Glancing involuntarily at each other, the young men exchanged smiles, while the doctor said softly: "Verdant—that's sure. Wonder if she'd knock at a church."

As Guy sat nearest the door, it was he who held it ajar while Madeline came in, her soft brown eyes glistening with something like a tear, and her cheeks burning with excitement as she took the chair indicated by Guy Remington, who found himself master of ceremonies.

Poor little Madeline!

CHAPTER II.

Madge her schoolmates called her, because the name suited her, they said; but Maddy they called her at home, and there was a world of unutterable tenderness in the voices of the old couple, her grandparents, when they said that name, while their dim eyes lighted up with pride and joy when they rested upon the young girl who answered to the name of Maddy. Their only daughter's only child, she had lived with them since her mother's death, for her father was a sea captain, who never returned from his last voyage to China, made two months before she was born. Very lonely and desolate was the home of Grandfather Markham have been without the presence of Madeline, but with her there, the old red farmhouse seemed to the aged couple like a paradise.

Forty years they had lived there, tilling the rather barren soil of the rocky homestead, and, saving the sad night when they heard that Richard Clyde was lost at sea, and the far sadder morning when their daughter died, bitter sorrow had not come to them; and, truly thankful for the blessings so long vouchsafed them, they had retired each night in peace with God and man, and risen each morning to pray. But a change was coming over them. In an evil hour Grandpa Markham had signed a note for a neighbor and friend, who failed to pay, and so it all fell on Mr. Markham, who, to meet the demand, mortgaged his homestead, the old rusty neighbor still insisting that long before the mortgage should be due, he certainly would be able himself to meet it. This, however, he had not done, and, after twice begging off a foreclosure, poor old Grandfather Markham found himself at the mercy of a grasping, remorseless man, into whose hands the mortgage had passed. It was vain to hope that Silas Slocum would wait. The note was due either be forthcoming, or the red farmhouse be sold, with its few acres of land. Among his neighbors there was not one who had the money to spare, even if he had been willing to do so. And so he must look among strangers.

"If I could only help," Madeline had said one evening when they sat talking over their troubles, "but there's nothing I can do, unless I apply for our school this summer. Mr. Green is committeeman, he will be sure and I don't believe but what he'll let me have it. I mean to go and see;" and, ere the old people had recovered from their astonishment, Madeline had caught her bonnet and shawl, and was flying down the road.

Madeline was a favorite with all, especially with Mr. Green, and as the school would be small that summer, the plan struck him favorably. Her age, however, was an objection, and he must take time to see what others thought of a child like her becoming a schoolmistress. Others thought well of it, and so before the close of the next day it was generally known through Hopedale, as the southern part of Devonshire was called, that pretty little Madge Clyde had been engaged as teacher, she receiving three dollars a week, with the understanding that she must board herself. It did not take Madeline long to calculate that twelve times three were thirty-six, more than a tenth of what her grandfather must borrow. It seemed like a little fortune, and blithe as a singing bird she flitted about the house, now stopping a moment to fondle her pet kitten, while she whispered the good news in its very appreciative ear, and then stroking her grandfather's silvery hair, as she said:

"You can tell them that you are sure of paying thirty six dollars in the fall, and if I do well, maybe they'll hire me longer. I mean to try my very best. I wonder if ever anybody before me taught a school when they were only fourteen and a half. You look as young as that!" and for an instant the bright, childish face scanned itself eagerly in the old-fashioned mirror, with the figure of an eagle on the top.

She did look very young, and yet there was something womanly, too, in the expression of the face, something which said that life's realities were already beginning to be understood by her.

"If my hair were not short I should do better. What a pity I cut it the last time: it would have been so long and splendid now," she continued, giving a kind of contemptuous pull at the thick, beautiful brown hair on whose glossy surface there was in certain lights a reddish tinge which added to its beauty.

"Never mind the hair, Maddy," the old man said, gazing fondly at her with a half sigh as he remembered another brown head, pillowed now to death the graveyard turf. "Maybe you won't pass muster, and then the hair will make no difference. There's a few commissioning, that Dr. Holbrook from Boston, and new ones are apt to be mighty strict."

Instantly Maddy's face flushed all over with nervous dread, as she thought: "What if I should fail!" fancying that to do so would be an eternal disgrace. But she should not. She was called by everybody the very best scholar in school, the one whom the teachers always put forward when desirous of showing off, the one whom Mr. Tiverton, and Squire Lamb, and Lawyer Whittemore always noticed so much. Of course she should not fail, though she did dread Dr. Holbrook, wondering much what he would ask her first, and hoping it would be something in arithmetic, provided he did not stumble upon decimals, where she was apt to get bewildered. She had no fears of grammar. She could pick out the most obscure sentence and dissect a double relative with perfect ease; then, as to geography, she could repeat whole pages of that, while in the spelling-book the foundation of a thorough education, as she had been taught, she had no superiors and but a very few equals. Still she would be very glad when it was over, and she appointed Monday, both because it was close at hand, and because that was the day her grandfather had set in which to ride to Aikenside, in an adjoining town, and ask its young master for the loan of three hundred dollars

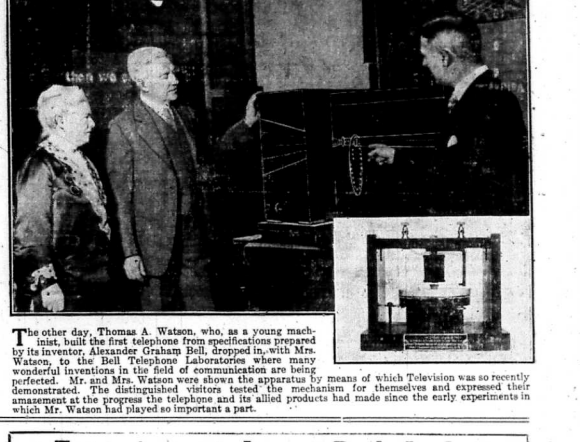
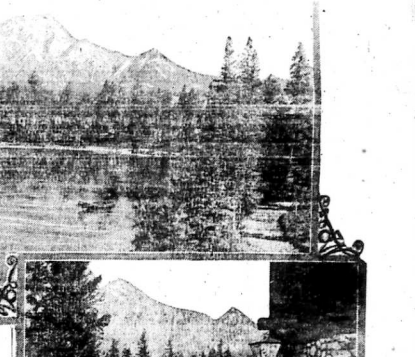
In One Man's Life Time



The other day, Thomas A. Watson, who, as a young machinist, built the first telephone from specifications prepared by its inventor, Alexander Graham Bell, dropped in with Mrs. Watson, to the Bell Telephone Laboratories where many wonderful inventions in the field of communication are being perfected. Mr. and Mrs. Watson were shown the apparatus by means of which Television was so recently demonstrated. The distinguished visitors tested the mechanism for themselves and expressed their amazement at the progress the telephone and its allied products had made since the early experiments in which Mr. Watson had played so important a part.

Extensions at Jasper Park Lodge



Lac Beauvert and a group of cottages at Jasper Park Lodge

The corner of the Inn and Bungalows along Pyramid Avenue, Jasper Park Lodge.

A golf club house, three new bungalows, one of which is to accommodate parties travelling with a private staff of servants, and extensions to the trail camps, comprise the spring program of building at Jasper Park Lodge, the tourist headquarters of Canada's famous Rocky Mountain Park, Jasper National Park, 5,300 square miles in area, is the largest national park in America. The extensions are required to provide for the heaviest tourist traffic westward for years, as it is indicated by the number of enquiries and requests for reservations reaching the offices of the Canadian National Railways in Canada and the United States.

The golf club house marks the finishing touch of the Jasper Park golf course, acclaimed by travelers and players alike to rank with the most spectacular and sporting in the world. The club house will face up the first and eighteenth fairways, offering splendid views of Mount Tekarra and the Whistler range. On this course in 1927 over 9,000 rounds were played.

The added provisions being made for trail riders include a new chalet at Lake Kinney on the way to Berg Lake behind Mounts Robson. Lake Kinney is set deep in the shadow of this "Monarch of the Canadian Rockies." Likewise the camps at Shovel Pass and Maligne and Medicine lakes are being extended.

During the past season approximately 10,000 guests were cared for at Jasper Park Lodge. Many other were not able to secure accommodation. This is a difficulty, however, which should not be encountered during the coming summer, for in addition to the enlargement of the Lodge, a thoroughly modern hotel is being built in the village three miles away. It is anticipated that this will be ready for the tourist season which commences during the latter part of May. Jasper Park Lodge is to be visited by members of the Canadian Weekly Newspaper's Association after their 1928 convention at Edmonton.

Receives M.D. Degree.

Miss Muriel Juanita Thompson, in graduating from the Medical College of the Toronto University this year, was awarded her degree of M.D., and also received a fellowship in bacteriology. She was born in Kingston, and educated in Napanee, going to Toronto about six years ago. She is the daughter of Mr and Mrs. J. D. Thompson, of 473 Brunswick Ave., Toronto.—Toronto Daily Star.

Dixon Everson.

A very pretty June wedding was solemnized in the United Church at Tamworth, Ont., on Saturday, June 9th, when Hazel Rebecca, eldest daughter of Rev. J. F. and Mrs. Everson became the bride of James Elmer Dixon, Belleville. The ceremony was performed by Rev. J. F. Everson, father of the bride, assisted by Rev. M. A. Hinton, Bobcaygeon, at high noon, under an arch of evergreens, bleeding hearts and lilacs. During the signing of the register, Mr. A. E. Skiff sang "Oh Promise Me." Jimmy and Luffey Everson, cousins of the bride, acted as ushers, and Flossie Everson, sister of the bride, played the wedding march, after which a reception was held. Luncheon was served to about sixty guests in the Church Hall. The bride was dressed in white silk jersey trimmed with silk lace and brilliants, with silk embroidered veil with orange blossoms, with shoes and stocking to match and carried a bouquet of lily of the valley. She travelled in sand silk flat crepe dress, and sand coat trimmed with mole and hat to match. The happy couple left by motor for Toronto, Niagara Falls and points south. On their return they will reside in Belleville.

Reception at Wilton.

A reception of much distinction was held at the lovely and spacious home of Mr and Mrs. A. W. Babcock, Wilton, on Monday evening for their daughter, Mrs. Cecil Edward Reid, a winsome bride of last week. Mr. and Mrs. Reid, wed, with Mrs. Babcock, mother of the bride, and Mrs. Reid, mother of the groom, received their guests, numbering seventy-five, in the arch of green and pink honey-suckle. The bride was gowned in powder blue georgette and shadow lace over an overdress of shell pink, hose to match the gown and silver slippers. The other floral decorations which went to make the home lovely were large bunches of lily-of-the-valley and bright colored tulips. Mrs. J. E. Miller and Mrs. Bernard Mills acted as matrons of honor, while Miss Gladys Wallace and Miss Rhoda Conners were the maids of honour. In the dining room Mrs. Norman Boyce and Mrs. Walter Shibley poured tea, white a dainty buffet luncheon was served. The girls assisting in the dining room were Miss Blanche Babcock, Miss Keitha Babcock, Miss Elenor Emberley, Miss Marion Babcock, Miss Helen Babcock, sister of the bride, who looked sweet and girlish gowned in white. During the evening musical selections were given by Mrs. Kenneth Babcock, Miss Gladys Wallace and Mr. J. E. Miller. As each guest went to their various homes they were presented with a box containing wedding cake and cards. The lovely gifts went to prove the high esteem in which the bride is held. We wish Mr. and Mrs. Reid every success and happiness in their new home.

THE WELL DRESSED MAN.

The young woman had just returned to her rural home from several years in the big city. She was exhibiting the contents of her trunk, to the admiration and amazement of her mother, who had bought her clothes for forty years at the general store.

DON'T BEND THE AXLE

BY ERWIN GREER

(President Greer College of Electrical and Automotive Trades, Chicago, Ill.)

The motor car is the product of the greatest industry in the world today and represents the most skilled engineering. Every facility for advancement is employed. Rigid tests are conducted through months under most expert supervision. When a motor car is delivered to the purchaser, it is the embodiment of correctness in every detail.

Special care is given the stress points to which road shocks are transmitted. This applies particularly to the steering gear, the alignment and camber of the wheels. Each angle is worked out to maintain strength and balance.

Because tires wear from other causes—principally under-inflation—there has been an increasing practice urged upon motorists to endeavor to correct tire wear by bending axles. This motor car engineers point out, is not only wrong, but dangerous.

The balance of the front end of the car is thrown out by any alteration of the axle or steering gear. This tends to make the car unmanageable. With the tendency of higher speed in the modern motor car and the universal adoption of four-wheel brakes, the front axle and steering gear have received more attention in design and manufacture than any other part of the car. As a matter of fact, practically every manufacturer has re-designed the front axle and steering mechanism to insure greater safety under all driving conditions.

To tamper with this design and balance is, obviously, to destroy al lof the engineering advancement that has been built into the cars.

Moreover, the practice of bending axles is deemed so dangerous by some of the manufacturers that they immediately remove the guarantee from any car so treated. Engineer declare that there have been instances of failure in these vital parts that have been tampered with, owing to unintended stresses being thrown upon them

When it is remembered that motor car engineers build to one-thousandth of an inch and less, it is ridiculous to believe that performance could be bettered by methods far removed from factory equipment and experience.

HOW GT. BRITAIN IS FED

MAN BUY ALMOST ANY KIND OF FOOD IN TINS.

The Growth of This "Ready to Serve" Food Industry Is a Business Romance Which Only Goes Back One Generation.

On the shore of a Norwegian ford one of those deep, dark arms of the sea which push their water far inland, men are working on their farms.

Suddenly a shout is heard—flock of gulls have been seen over the fjord. A look-out boy had given the signal. The men hurry down to their boats.

They are fishermen as well as smallholders. Brisling have come in from the sea. The opportunity must not be lost. Out come nets, oars are piled, sails are hoisted. They are a busy now on water as they were a short time back on land.

When you open a tin of these little fish for tea or supper, you don't, I expect, see that picture with your mind's eye, writes Hamilton Fyfe, in Answers.

Now, if you continue your meal with fruit salad out of a tin, do you think of the sun-steeped Californian orchard where the peaches ripened, the apricots on hot Italian hillsides or Australian valleys, the pineapple fruiting in Hawaii or Singapore, the harvest of American vineyards, the cherry-trees which in spring fill whole districts with their snowy blossoms.

Yet if you don't ever let your imagination move among the scenes when your food comes from, you miss a great part of the romance of life. All over the world there are men and women working for you, sowing and tending, pruning and picking, catching salmon and lobsters, pilchards and sardines, netting the nimble brisling on the Norwegian fords.

Part of the romance of food lies in the story of the industry last named. Thirty-eight years ago a young man called Angus Watson was shown a tin of fish, roughly packed, and not at all appetizing, in a grocer's shop at Newcastle-on-Tyne. In spite of the shortcomings of the sample, it suggested great possibilities to him.

He went to Norway as soon as he could. He inquired whether 1,000 cases could be supplied to his customers during the year. The order created consternation. An annual output of 400 cases was about the average then.

Now the pack in a good season exceeds 1,000,000 cases.

Mr. Watson did a great deal more than anyone else to develop this trade. He started a business of his own. He named the fish "skippers," after an action had been brought to prevent them being called sardines, and sold vast quantities.

At the same time he imported and distributed many other foods in tins, and later he started as a "packer" himself. His company, with $10,000,000 capital, is now one of the largest concerns in Newcastle, England. It sends its ready-to-serve foods not only all over Britain, but almost all over the world.

Not to the United States, however. There the secret of "putting the Joi" (reheard into the January larder" is exploited far more effectively than it is in Britain. At the Newcastle factory I saw soup being canned in what seemed to be large quantities. But I was told of one canner in America who turned out nearly 500,000,000 tins of soup a year!

But the ready-to-serve food habit, which has so complete a hold over Americans, is rapidly growing in the Old Country also, and in many other lands. The prejudice which was strong against it not many years back has almost died out. Fear of "poisoning" is a fear of the past. Preserved foods are safer than fresh.

Further, the notion that food lost its value when it was sterilized by heat (through losing its vitamins) has been completely exploded. The vitamins remain quite lively. People with small flats or houses and rather limited opportunities for cooking are only too glad of dishes ready to serve.

The greatest care is taken in these days to make sure that they are only ready to serve but fit to eat. Chemical tests are not considered sufficient. Strict search is made for harmful bacteria as well.

Heat is the agent used to-day to stop the normal decay of nature's products.

Here is a row of ovens, and here a truck running on rails through the factory. On the truck are a number of tins and glasses that are being filled by machinery. Now they go into the oven and are left in it just long enough for the destruction of the germs which cause decay.

Canning has made possible the world-wide distribution of countless products that were formerly purely local, has forged links which are every day increasing between us and the people of many far-off lands. They are different from us in speech, in race, in color; but we all belong to the same great family. We are all helping one another to live.

It took the Australian some time to fall into line with the modern ways, but now they are grading and preparing their fruit for sale with care. Pears, peaches, pineapples, apricots, all come from the Commonwealth. Canada sends magnificent canned apples, learn berries, raspberries. South Africa can grow almost all fruits and has learned from California how to pack them.

So the housewives of Britain will be "buying British" more and more every day, whether they know it or not.

Nova Scotia Wood Fibres, Ltd., is the name of a company incorporated under the Nova Scotia Companies Act to manufacture wood silk, silk fibres, pulp, paper, insulating board and all their products and by-products, etc. The head office is to be in Halifax, and the capitalization is $15,000,000.

CANADIAN WOMEN'S WORK

BY LUCINDA.

At the final session of the annual meeting of the National Council of Women, recently held in Toronto, Mrs. O. C. Edwards of Alberta, National Convener of Laws, gave the rules subscribed to by "The Three Womanhood League" in her report. The rules are : "Not to smoke, not to drink intoxicating liquors, not to motor with strange men, not to permit familiarities, not to accept expensive gifts from any man unless engaged to be married to him, or related to him, not to accept attentions from a man known to be married, not to read demoralizing literature, nor take part in any undesirable conversation and to attend church once a month."

On the whole these rules seem sane and useful. To many of us who know women of the utmost respectability who smoke now and then, it hardly seems that smoking, undesirable as it is for women, should be placed in the lead of the things to avoid, and on the other hand most of us would think we were sadly neglecting our duty if we only went to church once a month. But conditions are different in different localities and the women who though out these rules have wide experience and know that some thousands of people never go to church at all, even though nominal Christians. To keep our womanhood clean and pure is our duty. You know it is said that a nation never rises above the level of its women.

* * * *

We have just heard that the juice of the jewel weed or "touch-me-not" is a good first aid treatment for the inflammation caused by poison ivy. Many of the poisonous plants have an antedote near at hand if we only knew of it. The Indians and the first settlers, taught by them, knew of these handy remedies, but like many other useful bits of knowledge, the names of the herbs used has been lost with the passing years and the habit of depending entirely on medical aid.

* * * *

Already the camps are opening up and as soon as the schools close, families will leave the town house to spend the next two months in the country. Just now the woods are wonderful and the first cottagers will have the best of it. The birds are nesting and still a few stragglers are coming from the south. Do you know any of them ? If you do, you know that the knowledge adds much to the enjoyment of your holiday. If you know a few familiar birds and would like to know more of your visitors, send to the Geological Survey, Department of Mines, Ottawa, enclose fifty cents and ask for "Birds of Eastern Canada," by P. A. Taverner. You will get a book with colored plates and an excellent description of every bird you are likely to see. Ask at the same time for a book on the wild flowers of Eastern Canada and see what you can get. The June woods are filled with flowers. "I won't tell you where I saw them," said a lady recently, "because you might tell some of the people who would take them up by the roots, but I was in a wood where I gathered fifteen kinds of wild flowers." Well, we could tell her of some she didn't get, even then. And all summer, until the witch hazel puts forth its golden blossoms in the last days of October, we in Ontario, have a succession of flowers in our woods and fields. It is quite well worth while knowing their names.

* * * *

When you go off on a holiday, take as few clothes as you can get along with, unless you are going to visit friends or to a big, fashionable hotel. A knitted two piece suit, a crepe afternoon frock, and evening frock if you think you need one, but not unless a few cool dresses in case we might have warm weather, heavy shoes or tennis shoes for country walks are needed. A trunk is a great bother unless you are going to a town to stay. Two boxes hold a lot packed around a good hat and there are other neat cases that are easily carried.

Tall Darwin tulips make decorative beds and borders and the bulbs can be left in the ground all winter and seem to do better as time goes on. The other day we saw a charming effect made with pink tulips and ferns. A row of ferns from the woods ran beneath the edge of a verandah and, as if placed there, blossom by blossom, were tall pink tulips, their long stems hidden in by the ferns and only their pretty heads and a bit of graceful, slender neck showing. If you have enough ground to study effects, the working out of your own ideas in this way will give you more pleasure than a garden planted according to the directions of a landscape garden.

This is the month in which many of the Institutes hold their annual meetings. It is at these meetings that we hear of the marvellous amount of work done by the women of rural Ontario, of the classes attended for home cooking, first aid and home nursing, dressmaking and millinery, and the lectures on horticultural. Here too, we hear excellent papers on current events, that show us the reproach that we sometimes hear that the rural women do not keep in touch with what is going on in the world, does not refer to the W.I. The committee for historical research will give a report showing that Women's Institutes have awakened to the fact that in every community there is something worth while preserving to weave into the Canadian history we ourselves are making and committees in charge of village improvement will draw our attention to what is being done "For Home and Country" in their corner of the Dominion. And for every W.I. there should be a report on what the branch is doing to lessen the mortality among the young members of Canada. It is a year since the W.I. at the biennial meeting in Wolfville, N.S., placed the saving of the lives of mothers in the top of the list of things to be accomplished. A doctor is to be established at Tobermorry at the extreme point of the Bruce Peninsula. So far, so good, but that is only for one isolated spot. What next ?

Here is a strawberry dish, called Strawberry Velvet, that is recommended. One basket of ripe strawberries, wash but mix berries after washing the fruit, and put the rest in a saucepan with half a cup of water and two cups of sugar. Cook together and stew gently until the berries are soft. Strain off the syrup and cool it. When cold add a pint of thin cream, chilled. Pour into sherbet glasses, place a spoonful of whipped cream on top and put a strawberry with sugar on the top of that. Place on ice until ready to serve with wafers.

HEALTH SERVICE OF THE CANADIAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION

SCARLET FEVER ANTITOXIN

During the past few years there was discovered a scarlet fever antitoxin which gives the same satisfactory results in the treatment of diphtheria with diphtheria antitoxin.

Scarlet fever is caused by a certain disease germ which gives off a poison or toxin. It is this toxin which, in some cases, kills, and which in all cases does more or less damage to the various organs of the body.

The scarlet fever antitoxin counteracts the toxin. Given early and in sufficient quantity, it not only cures, but prevents the damage which may be so serious.

Those who are responsible for the care of children should appreciate that the life of the child, when attacked by sickness, may depend upon prompt treatment. certainly, in two diseases, scarlet fever and diphtheria, every hour's delay endangers the life of the child.

In Canada there were 362 deaths from scarlet fever during 1926. This loss of human life is, of course, serious. In addition, there is a much larger number who recovered, some of whom are more or less permanently damaged.

Scarlet fever antitoxin, like diphtheria antitoxin, should be made freely and readily available throughout Canada for the saving and conserving of human life.

Questions concerning Health, addressed to the Canadian Medical Association, 184 College St., Toronto, will be answered. Questions as to diagnosis and treatment will not be answered.

LIKE AN ARABIAN NIGHT'S ADVENTURE.

Have you ever wished to see with your own eyes deep-cavern-ed valleys, snow topped mountains, rugged pathways that lead adventurous souls from the heart of forest lands up to rocky, misty heights ?

All this is part of the magnificent panorama of mountain, glacier and racing stream that you can see and enjoy as you travel through to the Pacific Coast and to Alaska

On the way there you can stop off at Jasper National Park—see the wonders of this greatest of Canadian playgrounds.

Then leave civilization behind for a day or two as you pass through range after range of mighty forest-clad mountains. Taste again the joy of city life at beautiful Vancouver and Victoria. Then take the far-famed trip through the scenic seas of the North Pacific Coast to Alaska—the land of the Midnight Sun.

Low tourist fares are now in effect. The complete cost of the trip is surprisingly low—well within reach of the average person. This way you really see the West

Ask any Canadian National Railways Agent for full information and literature n these tours. He will be glad to assist you to plan your itinerary.

Local Jottings

Over 100,000 electric lights illuminate the Canadian National Exhibition Grounds at night.

Mr. J. M .Graham has leased the Imperial Oil Service Station on the corner of Dundas and West streets.

Herbert Hoover, secretary of Commerce in the Coolidge Administration has been chosen as Republican candidate for President of the United States.

In the "Tomato Week" window display contest conducted by the Canadian Canners, F. E. Mellow's grocery, Napanee, won third prize in zone 1, class B., which took in all grocery stores in Ontario outside of the large cities.

The first local game of the season for the Napanee Baseball Club will be played Wednesday afternoon at the Driving Park. Odessa will be the visiting team and when these two old rivals get together there is always plenty of excitment. A big crowd is expected.

Notice of appointment as Justice of the Peace has been received by Capt. A. S. Hughson, Napanee. Capt. Hughson is a veteran of the Great War, having served over three years in France and Belgium, and is at present on the Reserve of Officers of the Canadian Forces.

"Then came the Jews round about Him, and said unto Him, How long dost Thou make us to doubt ? If Thou be the Christ, tell us plainly. Jesus answered them, I told you and ye believed not : the works that I do in my Father's name, they bear witness of me. But ye believed not, because ye are not of my sheep, as I said unto you. My sheep hear My voice, and I know them, and they follow Me. And I give unto them eternal life ; and they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand. My Father which gave them me, is greater than all ; and no man is able to pluck them out of My Father's hand. I and my Father are one," John 10 : 24-30.

WHALES BRING $10,000.

Whaling Did Not Go Out With the Clipper Ships.

Whaling did not go out with the clipper ships at the advent of steam and kerosene.

The modern whale brings in money comparable with the proceeds of the old sea whaling when corset-makers paid $5 a pound for whalebone. It was revealed at the whale symposium recently at the United States National Museum under the auspices of the American Society of Mammalogists.

At the South Shetland Island's close to the Antarctic circle, Dr. Waldo L. Schmitt of the National Museum told the assembled scientists, floating factories convert the big cetaceans brought by the steam whalers into oil for the soap companies, bone chips for the meat refining industry, and ground dried meat for chicken feed. Under the efficient management a single whal will bring as high as $10,000. Dr. Schmitt declared.

At Eureka, Cal., is a shore station described by Dr. A. Brazier Howell also of the National Museum station where a similar whale factory operates on land. The highest value for a California whale, however, only reaches around $2,500.

A whale louse, one-third of an inch long, which is not really a louse at all but a member of the crab family that behaves like a louse, is one of the pests that make life interesting for the great sea beasts, according to Dr. H. C. Raven of the American Museum of Natural History.

The white whales have formed the basis of an industry that has descended from father to son in the province of Quebec, Canada, since colonial times. Copley Amory told the biologists and naturalists The slide of the big fellows are exported to Scotland where the canny Scots turn them all into shoestrings, and apparently make money at it.

The Cost of Soldiers' Uniforms.

It costs more than twice as much to fit out a Life Guards recruit (£25 12s. 10d.) as it does a recruit of any other regiment except the Foot Guards (£16 18s.), the Highland kilted regiments (£14 4s.) and the cavalry of the line (£13 12s. 7d.). The Royal Tank Corps recruit is the cheapest at £12 8s. 7d.

THE RULING PASSION.

Golf's a mighty funny game,
I never got it right ;
You buy a ball for ninety cents
Then knock it out of sight.

You hunt around in weeds and thorns
And find it in its den—
And take a club and try to knock
It out of sight again.

FOUNTAIN PENS

Visit to Factory Where They Are Made Is Both Instructive and Fascinating.

When you pay a visit to a factory where they are busy making fountain pens, says a writer in Tit-Bits, you will see long sheets of vulcanite flattened sheets of burnished gold, and tiny specks of osmiridium or other alloys used for pointing pens, all of which are being transformed in an incredibly short space of time into the finished article.

The works are divided into two main parts—the vulcanite shop and the gold shop. In the latter the nibs are cut out of flat sheets of gold with a steel die and passed over to the tipping experts. Tipping, or "pointing" as it is known in the trade, is the welding on of tiny pellets of osmiridium, or other "pointing" alloys to the tips of the nibs to prevent them from wearing away.

Osmiridium is the hardest metal in the world, and the heaviest. It is absolutely non-proof. South Africa and Tasmania are the largest producers of this rare white mineral, which has been found unboatable for pointing nibs, but owing to its high cost. It is only used for the most expensive pens. For the cheaper varieties alloys have to be used, but even these contain a small percentage of osmiridium or iridium (one of its component metals), to give the necessary hardness.

After the points have been welded, the nibs pass through various processes, being stamped with the maker's name, tempered, curved to the right shape, and polished. Finally the nibs are slit on a whirling, emery wheel. This die is exceedingly soft, but such is the revolving speed it cuts through the osmiridium. It needs a very highly specialised expert to handle the machine, for a slip of a thousandth of an inch will ruin the nib.

In the vulcanite shop long sticks of hardened rubber are hollowed out with delicate lathes and converted into the barrels of the pens. After the nibs have been fitted on, the finished article is filled with ink and fastened with clamps to an "ink-slinger." This is a revolving machine which whirls the pen at such a terrific speed that it dashes the ink out in streams should there be the tiniest leak.

In the course of the year, a fortune is picked from the floor of a fountain-pen factory. During the polishing and nib-slitting procession are continually being dropped to the floor, and on to the workers' clothes and hair. In one year alone, the value of these particles amounts to many thousands of pounds.

For this reason the zinc floors of the gold shop are covered with paper, their hands are treated in a similar manner. At the end of the day the girls on the slitting and polishing machines have to comb and brush their hair for minute fragments of the metals.

Since these waste eliminating methods were discovered the annual value in the gold and osmiridium bill has been enormous. What fortunes fountain-pen factory dust-bins must have contained in the old days!

CORN HUSKS ENTER TRADE.

Bales of "Waste" Are Used to Finish Hard Rubber.

The baling of corn husks, heretofore considered largely a waste product, is now giving employment to many men throughout the midwest corn states. For this new use the husks are cleaned and clamped between two iron disks, with an axle through the centre. The end are used for polishing hard rubber, much as emery wheels are used for polishing other materials. Combe and automobile steering wheels are two of the hard rubber products polished in this way.

It is estimated at the Sangamon County farm bureau, Springfield, Ill., through which the work in this section of the country was started, that one man can gather and bale 200 pounds a day, or a ton, worth $150, in ten days.

It takes from seven to ten acres to furnish a ton of husks.

THE DIVER'S TOOLS.

Perfecting Old and Inventing New Appliances.

The large number of big salvage operations that have been carried out recently has stimulated inventive brains to try to make the work of the diver easier by perfecting old and inventing new appliances.

Perhaps the most wonderful of these appliances is the new oxyacetylene torch, which works as freely in water as it does on shore, cutting the steel plates of a ship's hull as easily as cutting through clay.

Divers use this appliance to cut away the ragged edges of the holes that may have been made by the hull. After this has been done a timber patch is placed over the hole, and then the hold that has been flooded is pumped out, so that the ship may be made buoyant enough to rise to the surface.

To do this job the diver must have Hgh. This is supplied by the powerful submarine torch, which sheds a brilliant light, and the diver is enabled to move about freely, whereas in the days of the old hand-lamp he had to be wary of his steps.

The difficulty of directing operations by the salvage engineers is overcome by the submarine photographic camera.

A large camera is enclosed by a steel casing, which, by an arrangement, can be focussed from the outside. Powerful electric lamps form a part of the camera's equipment, so that the object to be photographed may be illuminated.

With the aid of this camera, clear photographs of the damage done to a ship can be taken under water, so that the salvage engineers are able to tell exactly what tools they require. Very often, when the water is clear, it is unnecessary to send a diver down simply to find an object, for the form of the sea can be seen quite well with the aid of a submarine telescope. It is called the "Catoptric Tube."

In appearance this tube is similar to an ordinary large telescope, but it has lugs attached to it, to which ropes can be attached for keeping it vertical in the water. Sometimes, instead of the ordinary telescope eyepiece, binoculars are fitted. Sometimes, instead of the ordinary telescope eyepiece, binoculars are fitted. This "Catoptric Tube" is very often used in recovering small articles of value that have been lost by dropping them in the sea from a pier or small boat.

"Aikenside"

He could hardly tell why he had thought of applying to Guy Remington for help, unless it were that he once had saved the life of Guy's father, who, as long as he lived, had evinced a great regard for his benefactor, frequently asserting that he meant to do something for him. But the something was never done, the father was dead, and in his stead the old man turned to the son, whom he knew to be very rich, and who he had been told was exceedingly generous.

"How I wish I could go with you clear up to Aikenside! They say it's so beautiful," Madeline had said, as on Saturday evening they sat discussing the expected events of the following Monday. "Mrs. Noah, the housekeeper, had Sarah Jones there once, to sew, and she told me all about it. There are graveled walks, and nice green lawns, and big, tall trees, and flowers—oh! so many!—and marble fountains with gold fishes in the basin; and statues, big as folks, all over the yard, with two brass lions on the gateposts. But the house is finest of all. There's a drawing room bigger than a ballroom, with carpets that let your feet sink in so far; pictures and mirrors clear to the floor—think of that, grandpa! a looking-glass so tall that one can see the very bottom of their dress and know just how it hangs. Oh, I do so wish I could have a peep at it! There are two in one room, and the windows are like doors, with lace curtains; but what is queerest of all, the chairs and sofas are covered with real silk, just like that funny, gored gown of grandma's up in the oak chest. Dear me! I wonder if we ever live in such a place as Aikenside?"

"No, no, Maddy, no. Be satisfied with the lot where God has put you, and don't be longing after something higher. Our Father in heaven knows just what is best for us, as He didn't see fit to put you up at Aikenside, 'tain't noways likely you'll ever live in the like of it."

"Not, unless I should happen to marry a rich man. Poor girls like me have sometimes done that, haven't they?" was Maddy's demure reply.

Grandpa Markham shook his head. "They have, but it's mostly their ruination; so don't build castles in the air about this Guy Remington."

"Me! Oh, grandpa, I never dreamed of Mr. Guy"' and Madeline blushed half indignantly. "He's too rich, too aristocratic, though Sarah said he didn't act one bit proud, and was so pleasant, the servants all worship him, and Mrs. Noah thinks him good enough for the Queen of England. I shall think so, too, if he lets you have the money. How I wish it was Monday night, so we could know sure!"

"Perhaps we both shall be terribly disappointed," suggested grandpa, but Maddy was more hopeful.

She, at least, would not fail, while what she had heard of Guy Remington, the heir of Aikenside, made her believe that he would accede at once to her grandpa's request.

All that night she was working to pay the debt, giving the money herself into the hands of Guy Remington, whom she had never seen, but who came up in her dreams the tall, handsome-looking man she had so often heard described by Sarah Jones after her return from Aikenside. Even the next day, when by her grandparent's side, Maddy knelt reverently in the small, timeworn church at Honedale, her thoughts, it must be confessed, were wandering more to the to-morrow and Aikenside, than to the sacred words her lips were uttering. She knew it was wrong, and with a nervous start would try to bring her mind back from decimal fractions to what the minister was saying, but Maddy was mortal, and right in the midst of the Collect, Aikenside and its owner would rise before her, together with the wonder how she and her grandfather would feel one week from that Sabbath day. Would the desired certificate be sent or would she be disgraced for ever and ever by a rejection? Would the mortgage be paid and her grandfather at ease, or would his heart be breaking with the knowing he must leave what had been his home for so many years? Not thus was it with the aged disciple beside her—the good old man, whose white locks swept the large-lettered book over which his wrinkled face was bent, as he joined in the responses or said the prayers whose words had over him so soothing an influence, carrying his thoughts upward to the house not made with hands, which he felt assured would one day be his. Once or twice, it is true, thoughts of losing the dear old red cottage flitted across his mind with a keen, sudden pang, but he put it quickly aside, remembering at the same instant how the Father he loved doeth all things well to such as are His children.

Grandpa Markham was old in the Christian course, while Maddy could hardly be said to have commenced as yet, and so to her that April Sunday was long and wearisome. How she did wish she might just look over the geography, by way of refreshing her memory, or see exactly how the rule for extracting the cube root did read, but Maddy forbore, reading only the Pilgrim's Progress, the Bible, and the book brought from the Sunday school.

With the earliest dawn however, she was up, and her grandmother heard her repeating to herself much of what she desired to know, and might question her upon. Even when bending over the washtub, for there were no washing day now, and only a book was arranged before her, so that she could study with her eyes, while her small, fat hands and dimpled arms were busy in the suds. Before ten o'clock everything was done, the clothes, white as the snowdrops in the garden bed on the other side of the line, the kitchen floor was scrubbed, the windows washed, the best room swept, and somewhat cleaned for dinner, and then Maddy's work was finished. 'Grandma could do all the rest," she said, and Madeline was free "to put her eyes out over them big books if she liked."

Swiftly flew the hours until it was time to be getting ready, when again the short hair was deplored, as before her looking-glass Madeline brushed her fragrant hair shining, beautiful locks. Would Dr. Holbrook think of her, age? Suppose he should ask it! Big no, he wouldn't. If Mr. Green thought her old enough, surely it was not a matter with which the doctor need trouble himself; and somewhat at ease on that point, Madeline coaxed her longest frock, and, standing on a chair, tried to discover how much of her pantalets was visible.

"I could see splendid when Mr. Remington's mirrors," she said to herself with a half-sigh of regret that her lot had not been cast in some such spot as Aikenside, instead of there beneath the hill in that wee bit of a cottage whose rear slanted back until it almost touched the ground. "After all, I guess I'm happier here," she thought. "Everybody likes me, while if I were Mr. Guy's sister and lived at Aikenside, I might be proud and wicked, and——"

She did not finish the sentence, but somehow the story of Dives and Lazarus, read by her grandfather that morning, recurred to her mind, and feeling how much rather she would rest in Abraham's bosom than share the fate of him who once was clothed in purple and fine linen, she pinned on her little neat plaid shawl, and, tying the blue ribbons of her coarse straw hat, glanced once more at the formidable cube root, and then hurried down to where her grandfather and old Sorrel were waiting for her.

"I shall be so happy when I come back, because I will then be over, just like having a tooth out, you know," she said to her grandmother, who bent down for the good-by kiss without which Maddy never left her. "Now, grandpa, drive on; I was to be there at three," and chirruping to Sorrel, the old man and Maddy went riding from the cottage door chatting cheerily until the village of Honedale was reached then, with a farewell to her grandfather, who never dreamed that the man whom he was seeking was so near, she tripped on the discrete walk, and, as we have seen, soon found in the presence of Dr. Holbrook, but also of Guy Remington.

Poor, poor little Maddy!

CHAPTER III.

It was Guy who received her. Guy who pointed to a chair. Guy who seemed perfectly at home, and, naturally enough, she took him for Dr. Holbrook, wondering why the other black-haired man could be and if he meant to stay in there all the while. It would be very dreadful if he did, and in her agitation and excitement the cube root was in danger of being altogether forgotten. Hall guessing the cause of her uneasiness, and feeling more averse than ever to taking part in the matter, the doctor, after a hasty survey of her person, withdrew into the background, and sat where he could not be seen. This brought the short dress into full view, together with the dainty little foot, nervously beating the floor.

"She's very young," he thought; 'too young, by far," and Maddy's chances of success were beginning to decline even before a word had been spoken.

How terribly still it was for the time during which telegraphic communications were silently passing between Guy and the doctor; the latter shaking his head decidedly, while the former insisted that he should do his duty. Madeline could almost hear the beatings of her heart, and only by counting and recounting the poplar trees growing across the street could she keep back the tears. What was he waiting for, she wondered, and, at last, summoning all her courage, she lifted her great brown eyes to Guy, and said, pleadingly:

"Would you be so kind, sir, as to begin?"

"Yes, certainly," and electrified by that young, bird-like voice, the sweetest save one he had ever heard, Guy knocked down from the pile of books the only one at all appropriate to the occasion, the others being a long way beyond what was taught in the district schools as his classical education was beyond Maddy's comprehension one.

Remembering that the teacher of whom he had once been for a week a pupil, in the town of Framingham, had commenced examinations by sharpening a lead pencil, so he now sharpened a similar one, determining as far as he could to follow that teacher's example. Maddy counted every fragment as it fell upon the floor, wishing so much that he would commence, and fancying that if he would not be half so bad to have him approach her with some one of the terrible dental instruments lying before her, as it was to sit and wait as she was waiting. Had Guy Remington reflected a little, he would never have consented to do the doctor's work; but, unaccustomed to country usages, especially those pertaining to schools and teaching, he did not consider that it mattered which examined that young girl, himself or Dr. Holbrook. Viewing it somewhat in the light of a joke, he rather enjoyed it! and as the Framingham teacher had first asked her pupils their names and ages, so he, when the pencil was sharpened sufficiently, startled Madeline by asking her name.

"Madeline Amelia Clyde," was the meek reply, which Guy quickly recorded.

Now, Guy Remington intended no irreverence; indeed, he could not tell what he did intend, or what it was which prompted his next query:

"Who gave you this name?"

Perhaps he fancied himself a boy again in the Sunday school, and standing before the railing of the altar, where, with others of his age, he had been asked the question propounded to Madeline Clyde, who did not hear the doctor's smothered laugh as he retreated into the adjoining room.

In all her preconceived ideas of this examination, she had never dreamed of being catechised, and with a feeling of terror as she thought of that long answer to the question, "What is thy duty to thy neighbor?" and doubted her ability to recite it, she said: "My sponsors, in baptism gave me the first name of Madeline Amelia, sir," adding as she caught and misconstrued the strange gleam in the dark eyes bent upon her, "I am afraid I have forgotten some of the catechism; I did not know it was necessary in order to teach school."

"Certainly, no; I do not think it is. I beg your pardon," were Guy Remington's ejaculatory replies, as he glanced from Madeline to the open door of the adjoining room, where was visible a table, on which, in large letters, the amused doctor had written "Blockhead."

There was something in Madeline's quiet, womanly, earnest manner which commanded Guy's respect, or he would have given vent to the laughter which was choking him, and thrown off his disguise. But he could not bear now to undeceive her, and, resolutely turning his back upon the doctor, he sat down by that pile of books and commenced the examination in earnest, asking first her age.

"Going on fifteen," sounded older to Madeline than "Fourteen and a half," so "Going on fifteen" was the reply, to which Guy responded: "That is very young, Miss Clyde."

"Yes, but Mr. Green did not mind. He's the committeeman. He knew how young I was." Madeline said, eagerly, her great brown eyes growing large with the look of fear which came so suddenly into them.

Guy noticed the eyes then, and thought them very bright and handsome for brown, but not so bright or handsome as a certain pair of soft blue orbs he knew, and feeling a thrill of satisfaction that sweet Luey Atherstone was not obliged to sit there in that doctor's office to be questioned by him or any other man, he said: "Of course, if your employers are satisfied it is nothing to me, only I had associated teaching with women much older than yourself. What is logic, Miss Clyde?"

The abruptness with which he put the question startled Madeline to such a degree that she could not positively tell whether she had ever heard that word before, much less could she recall its meaning, and so she answered frankly: "I don't know."

A girl who did not know what logic was did not know much, in Guy's estimation, but it would not do to stop here, and so he asked her next how many cases there were in Latin!

Maddy felt the hot blood tingling to her very finger-tips, the examination had taken a course so widely different from her ideas of what it would probably be. She had never looked inside a Latin grammar, and again her truthful "I don't know, sir," fell on Guy's ear, but this time there was a half-deprecating tone in the young voice usually so hopeful.

"Perhaps, then, you can conjugate the verb Amo," Guy said, his manner indicating the doubt he was beginning to feel as to her qualifications.

Maddy knew well what "conjugate" meant, but that verb Amo, what could it mean? and had she ever heard it before? Mr. Remington was waiting for her; she must say something, and with a gasp she began: "I amo, thou amoest, he amoes. Plural: We amo, ye or you amo, they amo."

Guy looked at her aghast for a single moment, and then a comical smile broke all over his face telling poor Maddy plainer than could words that she had made a most ridiculous mistake.

"Oh, sir," she cried, her eyes wearing the look of the frightened hare, "it is not right. I don't know what it means. Tell me, teach me. What is it to amo?"

To most men it would not have seemed a very disagreeable task, combining young Madeline Clyde "to amo," as she termed it, and some such idea flitted across Guy's mind, as he thought how pretty and bright was the eager face upturned to his, the pure white forehead, suffused for a faint flush, the cheeks a crimson hue, and the pale lips parted slightly as Maddy appealed to him for the definition of "amo."

"It is a Latin verb, and means 'to love,'" Guy said, with an emphasis on the last word, which would have made Maddy blush had she been less anxious and frightened.

Thus far she had answered nothing correctly, and, feeling puzzled to know how to proceed, Guy stepped into the adjoining room to consult with the doctor, but he was gone. So, returning, Guy resumed the examination by asking how "minus into minus could produce plus."

Again Maddy was at fault, and her low-spoken "I don't know" sounded like a wail of despair. Did she know anything, Guy wondered, and feeling some curiosity as to ascertain that fact, he plied her with questions philosophical, questions algebraical, and questions geographical, until in an agony of distress Maddy raised her hands deprecatingly, as if she would ward off any similar questions, and sobbed out:

"Oh, sir, no more. It makes my head so dizzy. They don't teach that in common schools. Ask me something I do know."

Suddenly it occurred to Guy that he had gone entirely wrong and foolishly burying himself for the block head the doctor had called him, he asked kindly:

"What do they teach? Perhaps you can enlighten me?"

"Geography, arithmetic, grammar, history, and spelling-book," Madeline replied, untying and throwing off her bonnet, in the vain hope that it might bring relief to her poor, giddy head, which throbbed so fearfully that all her ideas seemed for the time to have left her.

This was a natural consequence of the high excitement under which she was laboring, and, when Guy did not ask her concerning the books designated, she answered but little better than before, and Guy was wondering what he should do next, when the doctor's welcome step was heard, and leaving Madeline again, he repaired to the next room to report his ill success.

"She does not seem to know any thing. The veriest child ought to do better than she has done. Why, she has scarcely answered half a dozen questions correctly."

This was what poor Maddy heard though it was spoken in a low whisper, but every word was distinctly understood and burned into her heart's core, drying her tears and hardening her into a block of marble. She knew that Guy had not done her justice and this helped to increase the torpor stealing over her. Still she did not lose a syllable of what was saying in the back office, and her lips curled scornfully when she heard Guy remark: "I pity her; she is so young, and evidently takes it so hard. Maybe she's as good as they average. Suppose we give her the certificate."

Then Dr. Holbrook spoke, but to poor, dazed Maddy his words were all a riddle. It was nothing to him —who was he that he should be dictating thus? There seemed to be a difference of opinion between the young men, Guy insisting that out of pity she should not be rejected, and the doctor demurring on the ground that he ought to be more strict. As usual, Guy overruled, and seating himself at the table, the doctor was just commencing: "I hereby certify——" while Guy was bending over him, when the latter was startled by a hand laid firmly on his arm, and turning quickly he confronted Madeline Clyde, who, with her short hair pushed from her blue-veined brow, her face as pale as ashes, save where a round spot of purplish red burned upon her cheeks, and her eyes gleaming like coals of fire, stood before him.

"He need not write that," she said, huskily, pointing to the doctor. "It would be a lie, and I could not take it. You do not think me qualified. I heard you say so. I do not want to be pitied. I do not want a certificate because I am so young and you think I'll feel badly. I do not want——"

Her voice failed her, her bosom heaved, and the choking sobs came thick and fast, but still she shed no tear, and in her bright, dry eyes there was a look which made both those young men turn away involuntarily. Once Guy tried to excuse her failure, saying she no doubt was frightened. She would probably do better again, and might as well accept the certificate, but Madeline still cried no, so decidedly that further remonstrance was useless. She would not take what she had no right to, she said, but if they pleased she would wait there in the back office until her grandfather came back; it would not be long, and she should not trouble them.

Guy brought her the easy-chair from the front room and placed it for her by the window. With a faint smile she thanked him and said: "You are very kind," but the smile hurt Guy cruelly, it was so sad, so full of unintentional reproach, and the eyes she lifted to his looked so grieved and weary that he mentally murmured to himself: "Poor child!" as he left her, and with the doctor repaired to the house, where Agnes was impatiently waiting for them. Poor, poor little Maddy! Her only smile who may at her distress, it was the first keen disappointment she had ever had, and it crushed her as completely as many an older person has been crushed by heavier calamities.

(To be Continued.)

Birds' Atlantic Flight.

A colony of lapwings recently made a wonderful flight across the Atlantic from Britain to Newfoundland in twenty-four hours.

The lapwing finds its food in the fields and is not a sea-bird, and therefore could not possibly have been sustained by food picked up by following steamers.

The birds probably flew at forty miles an hour in their own speed, and were helped by a gale, which might bring their mileage up to over seventy. Even then, to fly for twenty-four hours without rest or food shows amazing endurance and tenacity. One of the birds was found to have been ringed in Cumberland in 1926.

When Bruin Makes Friends

Visitors to Jasper National Park, which is Canada's largest and finest national playground, situated in the heart of the Rocky Mountains, have a splendid opportunity of studying the habits of wild animals. For Jasper National Park is a game sanctuary in the finest sense of the word, and guns and hunting dogs are forbidden within its boundaries. It is of interest to observe the manner in which the animals recognize this. Though it is only comparatively few years since this great sanctuary was set aside, the shy deer and mountain sheep are no longer shy, the black and brown bears have become daily visitors to village and to hotel grounds, and the animal population of the park is increasing by leaps and bounds.

However, it is Bruin who demonstrates perhaps most forcibly, how the animals have come to regard man as their friend instead of as their enemy. Now it is a daily event to have one or more bears visit the Lodge grounds in search of the titbits which they know tourists love to feed to them. Nor is it unusual for a golfer playing over the magnificent scenic course which has been laid out in the Athabasca Valley, to meet a bear at the turn of the fairway, or to see a shy deer viewing him with interest as he gets down to line up his putt on one or another of the greens.

A short time ago, it was estimated that the mountain sheep population of this 5,300 square mile national park was over 10,000, with an equal number of deer, while the bears are numbered in thousands and are seen at almost any turn of the road. And when once a bear cub has developed a taste for sugar, he is a confirmed visitor to the Lodge grounds.—Canadian National Railways photograph

Seven Seas Traversed

We passed in luxurious comfort, free from any care or irritating responsibility and absolutely without one disturbing incident from continent to continent," stated Lady Williams-Taylor on her return from a world cruise on board the Canadian Pacific liner, the "Empress of Australia," during which tour five continents, twenty-one countries and twenty-six ports were visited and seven seas traversed.

"With sheltered ease," continued Lady Taylor, "we had unfolded to us the soul-penetrating magnificence and the somewhat repellant fanatical conditions of India and distraught, yet ever thrillingly interesting China. We steamed up and down the dangerous Pearl River, and saw first-hand the devastation of Canton. Mysterious Java, and almost untouched Sumatra, held us spellbound. Singapore and its ever-growing docks amazed us, and lovely Ceylon enchanted us. But Hawaii wound itself about our hearts and, to its haunting 'Aloha Oe,' we saw it fade away through regretful tears. Not only are the islands more than fascinating, but the Royal Hawaiian Hotel would tempt any traveller to return.

"After such a wonderful tour of 133 days," concluded Lady Taylor, "we 'Lotus Eating Tourists' have once again to face the realities of ordinary existence without the untiring supervision and perfect organization of the mighty and far-reaching Canadian Pacific Railway and Steamship's protection and care of us. It was, indeed, with hearts full of gratitude and appreciation for our splendid captain, his staff, and for the constant and devoted attention of the cruise directors, that we finally bid farewell to our floating home—the 'Empress of Australia.'"

GETTING THE TRADE.

Steamships Carrying Freight Must Make Faster Time.

The recent speeding up of commerce and the need for fewer transport has now very distinctly extended to the cargo liner, say the Canadian export magazine. Orders which have been placed recently indicate that ships 15 to 16 knots secure the contracts on the specialized cargo contained the highest revenue and, too, practically certain sailing business when trade is slack and the slower boats plough their way through the oceans with holds nearly empty.

The increase of speed from about 10 knots in a very few years has brought a new competitive force into the shipping business, and nowhere is it more apparent than in the Pacific where some of the most remunerative business is to be had in the transport of goods between North and South America.

This speed is very little less than that of many 15,000 to 20,000-ton passenger liners of modern construction, and is only two knots less than most of the crack liners, with all their luxurious trappings, which are engaged on the European South American passenger trade.

Until quite recently owners have contrived to carry a few passengers as a means of partially meeting the high fuel bills which these fast ships incur; but latterly they have found in cabants who are keen enough on the speedy transport of their goods from one country to another to pay the extra rates demanded. That there is not likely to be a halt at these speeds is evident from the trial results of one or two motorships during the last few weeks where up to 16½ knots has been recorded.

A CASHLESS BANK.

Bank of Commerce Introduces Innovation in New Branch

The first "cashless" bank to be established in Canada, which consists of the savings department of the Toronto Queen and Yonge street branch of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, is declared to have been an unqualified success, and other Canadian chartered banks are expected shortly to follow the lead of the Bank of Commerce and establish similar "cashless" banks.

This branch bank is all that its name implies, literally a cashless bank. The old style metal railed fences are entirely done away with, and the only thing that separates the depositor from the bank cashier is a beautiful mahogany counter of cast vealed bright enough that customer and bank official can comfortably carry on their business without the intervening obstacle of familiar iron bars. The exceptional breadth of the counter itself affords protection to the tellers, whose cash is contained in specially contrived cash drawers that the touch of a finger swings shut and automatically safe-locked beyond the ability of any ordinary thief to pry open.

The chief virtue of this new departure lies in the fact that much greater speed in service is possible; and hence the lesser queues of waiting customers usually to be found at peak-load hours before both tellers' and ledger windows, are practically done away with. For tellers and ledger-keepers are combined in the one person with the aid of specially devised banking machinery now available for the first time to Canadian bankers.

By means of speedy equipment, known as the National Posting Machine, the single clerk who operates the cash drawer has instantly before her the full details of the customer's account; and by pushing a few keys situated immediately ahead of the customer's ledger card, passbook and the journal sheet, which replaces the old handwritten blotter the precise amount of deposit or withdrawal. The machine then automatically brings the total up to date, enters the same in the three documents indicated; and should the depositor forget his passbook, why the machine automatically makes him out a deposit receipt for his money, leaving no room for argument or uncertainty as to date or amount of deposit.

In the case of the Bank of Commerce, two machines and two operators are in use; and this equipment is stated to be capable of handling more than 800 entries a day, automatically proving all transactions as it goes along, with lock-and-control totals available only to the accountant who holds the keys and is thus able to accurately check cash and audit accounts daily in a complete duty few minutes. As a matter of fact, the savings department has been able to clear her cash and accounts on the installation of the new equipment with totals proved a carly as an hour after close of bank business day at three p.m.

Of course the big advantage is the added service to customers and the elimination of the big queues at peak-load hours. It is said that less than half a minute is required for the average customer's transactions and under this system of speed and accuracy the waiting line of customers soon melts away.

A RECORD FOR SLOWNESS.

Academie Francaise Finds Words Better Than Action.

The famous dictionary being prepared by the Academie Francaise is about half done after fifty years of work and this first part will be published soon. The Academie has the world's record for slowness. In the three centuries of its existence its one continuous job has been the official French dictionary, which itself is rarely seen, but which serves as the basis for other similar and more condensed works.

The first edition of the dictionary was started in 1638 and was published fifty-six years later. Succeeding editions usually were issued in sections, as will be the present one.

Each time many new words are accepted, but by the time the Academie reaches a section many of the accepted words become obsolete. At each session one or more words are discussed by the academicians and the public gets much amusement out of some decisions, such as the recent refusal to admit the word "midinette," the popular description of the little Parisian working girl. The aged scholars thought the name a flippant colloquialism.

HOLYROOD HOUSE

Queen Mary Is Transforming Palace —Work of Beautification— Scottish Regalia.

The Queen's Scottish palace, Holyrood House, is shedding its dark, historic memories. It is now nearly an abbey and dates back to the year 1128.

The structure suffered from fire on several occasions, and in 1566 was the scene of the murder of David Rizzio, a favorite of Mary Queen of Scots in 1564.

The newer part of Holyrood House, which dates from Charles II.'s day, is now used as the residence of the sovereigns when they are staying in Edinburgh. This is generally known, no doubt, but what is not so much known outside Edinburgh is the way in which the Queen is transforming this palace. She is turning the royal apartments into a place to be lived in, in a suitably fine and distinguished manner of course, but to be lived in.

Pieces of furniture are finding their way from the cellars into the state apartments, new curtains of a pleasant tint of light green have been laid down in several rooms. Above all, workmen of capacity, with the zeal and patience of poets revising epics, are removing the varnish with which an intrusive decorative era had covered all of the palace which it could. Doors and walls and inclusive, deep carving round chimney pieces had all been in the last century as liberally treated with polish as if they had been boots. Paint, too, has been expunged from stretches of wood, panels, and the like, of which the pleasant grain was completely hidden.

A sort of tinted layer of stars has been cleaned off the centre of the ceiling of a presence-chamber, which is now back in the pure white gesso state which its Italian moulders intended. One large room has been completely stripped of all falsities, and is now a noble apartment; it is known as the breakfasting-room. A room used by the King for audiences is in the first stage after the removal of the varnish; the decorations of the fireplace here are very fine, but must have been particularly difficult to clean.

All this is the Queen's work. Her Majesty's taste is having a very fortunate effect upon her subjects of Edinburgh. They come in and see the difference between former and present conditions, and are much impressed. "Queen Victoria had it all clagged up with varnish," said one in my hearing, "but the Queen's doing it. Not a lick of paint and not a scrap of wallpaper anywhere in the palace, those are her orders, so they say. It looks fine."

The newest and most important alterations of all by the Queen's desire are to be made presently in the throne-room itself. I was told, when visiting this, that the characteress blue material of George IV.'s day which covers the wall is to be stripped off and the walls will be refitted with panelling. When completed the room should make a worthy frame for the Scottish courts held by the King here, and for the display of that portion of the Scottish regalia which is used.

The Scottish regalia, housed in a room in a tower of the castle, are a mystery of Edinburgh. In so far at least that they come as a surprise and mystery to most English visitors, who are unaware that the Scottish crown and sceptre still exist. Still less are they aware that the old crown is not only never worn by our present sovereign, but actually must not be, by law. It became heritable a stipulation of the Act of Union between England and Scotland that the Scottish crown must be forever deposited in Edinburgh Castle but not be donned by the monarch.

Looking at the crown there in the castle, one is inclined to wish that this old regulation might be abrogated. There may have been a reason for it in its day, but surely in ours England and Scotland are sufficiently wedded to allow the reigning king to wear, at least once, on some formal occasion, the crown of Scotland. Without this acting as a solvent of the union.

If the story of its origin and adventures as given is accurate, it is as romantic a crown from its history as any in the world. The circlet was worn by Robert Bruce, and it was Mary Queen of Scots who had it transformed from that simple band of gold into the more arched crown. There is a certain simplicity about it befitting the northern kings; it does not glitter with diamonds, being mostly set with pearls and other quiet gems.

Charcoal for Auto's Fuel.

The use of charcoal for producer-gas as a propellant for motor vehicles is being seriously considered in Great Britain. The forests products research laboratory has already conducted preliminary experiments on various methods of preparing charcoal for this purpose. So far they have investigated two French types of pottle kilns, and also the more ordinary type of beehive kiln. Arrangements have been made with the fuel research station to carry out tests on the charcoal prepared from various species of timber, and to determine its value for producer gas.

Ordered to Beware of Gambling.

Members of the Communist party and the Union of Communist Youth have been instructed to stay away from all gambling houses, under pain of incurring party punishment. The injunction, which emanated from the party control committee, pointed out the harmfulness of gambling and declared that Communists must not enter buildings where it goes on, even as spectators.

London's Strangest Club.

The strangest club existing in London is run to help those who have been in prison and do not intend to go there again. It is aptly named the "Run Straight Club."

Water Waste.

A defective washer in a tap, causing it to drip constantly, will waste as much as 150 gallons of water a day.
